Unlike our modern wrld, where the majority of people live in neighborhoods or communities, navaho families lived by themselves. A Navaho family would lived in a structure called a hogán, which isolated from other hogáns and quite often hidden, so that the casual passerby would be unlikely to see it. While usually build near a good fuel supply and not too far from water, the hogáns were never situted too close to any watering hole so as not to disturb the game that would come to seek water there. it has been supposed that the Custom of concealing their homes came from a time when the Navaho were warriors and plunderers, and had to remain ever cautious that their enmies would come seeking revenge.
