Sam passed out his party invitations on the last day of school, but rather than handed them to his friends individually, he slipped each one through the slits in his friends' lockers. Everyone is emptied out their lockers and packed up their things that day, and once they get home many of his friends didn't bother to unpack. Backpacks are tossed into corners and closets, and stacks of old school papers were dropped onto desks or, in some cases, toss into the trash without a second glance. Consequently, half of Sam's friends never even seen their invitations. On the day of his party, very few of his friends show up, which hurt Sam's feelings. Still, were he a little bit more deliberate in passing out the invitations his feelings would never have gotten hurt.
